

CONTRIBUTORS TO THIS ISSUE

Erik H. Cohen is director of the Research and Evaluation group based in Jerusalem, Israel, which conducts international research projects on subjects such as informal education and ethnic (particularly Jewish) identity, and has been widely published on these subjects. Other professional and research interests include philosophy, cross-cultural studies, tourism, adolescence, and data analysis based on the Louis Guttman methodology. He teaches at the School of Education, Bar-Ilan University. He serves on many scientific and cultural advisory committees. He received his Ph.D. in sociology from the University of Nanterre, France. He was born in Morocco and is married with three sons.

Katherine Giuffre is assistant professor of sociology at Colorado College. Her research interests include social networks, the sociology of art and culture, and social theory.

Sheila Royo Maxwell is currently associate professor in the School of Criminal Justice at Michigan State University. Her research interests include sanctioning processes and attitudes towards sanctions, youth antisocial behaviors and delinquency, and cross-cultural criminology. Current projects include a grant from the National Science Foundation to examine youth antisocial behaviors in the Philippines using multiple measures to examine the validity of youth responses.

W. Lawrence Neuman is professor of sociology at the University of Wisconsin-Whitewater, where he also serves as director of the Pacific Asian Educational Resource Center. His research interests include study of how political climate and institutional context influence changes in U.S. anti-monopoly policy.

D. Clayton Smith is assistant professor of sociology at Western Kentucky University. Professor Smith's primary research interest is in the connections among social psychology, environmental and natural resources sociology, community sociology, and social movements theory. He also maintains an interest in student performance differences on education tests that he developed while he worked as a research sociologist with the Kentucky Department of Education. Professor Smith is the author (with E. Walsh and R. Warland) of Don't Burn it Here: Grassroots Challenges to Trash Incinerators (Penn State Press).

Nicholas H. Wolfinger is assistant professor in the Department of Family and Consumer Studies at the University of Utah. His interests include divorce, social demography, and research methods. His book on intergenerational transmission of divorce will be published by Stanford University Press.